LIST OF SOIL SURVEY REPORTS

The Department of Agriculture, in cooperation with State agricultural experiment stations and other Federal and State agencies, has been making soil surveys and publishing soil survey reports since 1899. These surveys are designed to furnish soil maps and interpretations needed in planning research and disseminating the results of the research, and they are used in educational programs, in giving technical assistance to farmers and ranchers, and in guiding other decisions about soil selection, use, and management. Sound scientific and technical standards are used in a nationwide system of soil classification, nomenclature, interpretation, and publication.

Soil classification has improved as our knowledge about soils and their potential uses has increased. As agriculture has become more technical, a proper fit between the kind of soil and the combination of practices used has become more critical. Because of this, soils bearing the same names are more narrowly defined in recent surveys than in the older ones.

When soil survey work began in 1899 little was known about the soils of the United States. Since then a great deal has been learned, methods have been improved, and the results of the surveys are more accurate and detailed. For planning farms, engineering structures, parks, urban developments, and other uses of land, the recent soil survey reports are more useful. The older reports can be of considerable assistance for many users, but the soil maps are more general than those in recent reports and some of the interpretations need to be updated.

Soil survey reports contain, in addition to soil maps, general information about the agriculture and climate of the area and descriptions of each kind of soil. The reports include a discussion of the formation and classification of the soils in the area and also soil laboratory data when available.

Soil survey reports published since 1957 contain many different kinds of interpretations for each of the different soils mapped in the area. The kinds of interpretations included in these recent reports vary with the needs of the area, but the following interpretations may be found in most of them: Estimated yields of the common agricultural crops under defined levels of management, land-capability interpretations, soil-woodland interpretations, rangeland interpretations, engineering uses of soils, interpretations for community planning, suitability of the soil for drainage and irrigation, and suitability of the soil for recreation and wildlife.

Most of the soil surveys published since 1957 contain soil maps printed on a photomosaic base. The map scale commonly used is 1:20,000; 1:7,920, again depending upon the needs of the area.

A soil survey report published by the U.S. Department of Agriculture that is still in print may be obtained in one of the following ways:

Landowners or operators in the area surveyed and professional workers who have use for the report can obtain a free copy from the local office of the Soil Conservation Service, from their county agent, or from their congressman. Those outside the area surveyed who have a use for the report can obtain a free copy from the Information Division, Soil Conservation Service, Washington 25, D.C.

For a time after publication, copies may be purchased from the Superintendent of Documents, Government Printing Office, Washington 25, D.C.

Many libraries have soil survey reports for reference. Also soil conservation district offices and county agricultural extension offices have copies of the local soil survey report that may be used for reference.

This publication lists those reports that have been published by the U.S. Department of Agriculture. A few State agencies also publish reports, but these are not included in this list.

The asterisk indicates those reports that are out of print and no longer available for distribution.

The date indicates the year the field work was completed.

Most soil survey reports cover one or more counties and are so named. Where the survey covers only a part of one or more counties the word "area" is a part of the report name.
